People tend to form a long line out of curiosity. It was about two years ago when a Japanese pancake shop grandly opened beside my house. However, after the opening ceremony, the swarm of people never seemed to disappear. There were people from young to old forming an extremely long and winding line since 7 o'clock every morning. I wonder what kind of attraction could ordinary snacks like pancakes provide? Thus, out of curiosity, I carefully stepped into the ever-growing line. However, the line moved so slowly that I merely moved from one sidewalk tree to another after waiting for half an hour! Anger and angst grew from the bottom of my heart while winding and turning from a corner to another. And finally, when I got to the head of the line, they announced that the pancakes were sold out! How irritating and frustrating it was!

Stomping home with heavy steps, thinking that I would probably never forget this terrible lining up experience.

Regarding this phenomenon and my own lining up experience, I arouse two pieces of reflection and thoughts. First, while recalling former lining up experiences, I found that forming a long line actually decreases the urge and lowers the anticipation of either <sup>the</sup> consumers or tourists. While waiting in such a long line, the sense of anger often surpasses the sense of happiness and accomplishment, thus causing bad effects to the shops or tourist spots. Second, the long lines pose threats and inconvenience to their neighborhood by causing traffic jams and creating <sup>a</sup> noisy environment. Take the Japanese pancake store for example, it lies between my house and my bus stop to school. Thus, I have to either squeeze through those <sup>noisy</sup> people or choose a further routine to get to the bus stop, but both of them bring me great inconvenience. I think that this lining up phenomenon should be replaced <sup>and reduced</sup> by ways such as Internet order or delivering system since the technology today has improved. To sum up, I believe that reducing forming long lines in stores and tourist spots <sup>is a must, and</sup> will surely lead us to a better and brighter society!
