

二. It's a common experience that people stand in line to wait for buying some products; however, it sometimes doesn't pay to do it. It was once reported that a restaurant was newly opened near my house. Out of curiosity, my family decided to give it a try. Not until we stepped out our house did we found out that it had formed a long line. We were so shocked as we didn't expect that it would be so popular that it took us approximately an hour to wait in line. Nonetheless, it was not until we eventually got into the restaurant and had meals that we regretted. Much to our regret, the dishes didn't meet our satisfaction. Although the food was well-prepared, we all thought that it didn't deserve a long time of waiting.

Such experience did give me an opportunity to reflect on the phenomenon of forming a long line. People may do it for several reasons, such as out of curiosity, wanting to try new things. Sometimes they don't even know what they are waiting for. They tend to follow the fad without pondering if they really need to do so. What's worse, such situation may bring about terrible traffic congestion or garbage strewn all over the floor. Therefore, we should think twice whether it deserves to wait for, not just because of fad, before making a decision. Otherwise, it might turn out to be a waste of time. As far as I'm concerned, I would consider carefully instead of springing into action simply after watching news reports. I would keep the lesson of this experience in mind and hope that it would not happen again.
