Owing to the convenience brought by advanced information technologies like the Internet or the smartphones, news and informations^{can be} spreaded widely and quickly within the modern society. Under such a circumstance, it's rather usual for a tourist attraction or a restaurant to become famous and popular overnight. And the phenomenon of people forming long lines is thus created. Especially in Taiwan, a paradise for local as well as foreign tourists, this phenomenon is quite common. For instance, there is an extraordinary coffee shop which serves great coffee and cuisines^{around my house}. It has been my habit to visit there in my spare time. Sitting by the sun-lit table in the atmospheric and spacious coffee shop and have a nice cup of coffee is one of the most glee-ful experiences. However, on a weekend in November, I headed cheerfully toward the coffee shop just as usual, only to find that there was a unprecedented long line in front of it. The reason for that is that, after the shop appeared on a online news earlier that month, it has become a huge attraction for tourists. Nevertheless, to my surprise, the crowds were gone merely a month later. It turned out that they were chasing the fashion and started to form a line in front of another shop.

As far as I'm concerned, such phenomenon is not very desirable. After all, these people forming lines are usually just motivated^{by} a fad that will subside in no time. They visit the places for fashion instead of their true values. Not knowing how to appreciate the attractions' values, they might end up damaging them. Also, being in^{a long} line is rather time-consuming. In my opinion, people can make good use of time and do more meaningful things such as helping others or improving themselves instead of waiting in long lines just to catch up with the trends. Especially in a modern society where time is money, chasing fashion can sometimes be a waste of our precious time. To sum up, I personally don't like the phenomenon of blindly chasing the trends and forming a long, dreadful line. At the end of the day, it may be harmless to notice and be fond of the fashion trends, but we have to evaluate them with our free will and avoid blindly obeying them or following the crowds meaninglessly.
