Not only Taiwanese but also people all over the world prefer to pursue something prevalent or intriguing owing to their curiosities. Thus, the phenomenon that people form a long line for the sake of some brand-new fads is somewhat ubiquitous around the world.

Take one of my friends for instance. Once, there was a globally renowned restaurant open in Taipei, whereas we resided in Hualien. However, incentivized by his tremendous desire to savor the delicacies in it, he resolved to rush to Taipei... in order to be the first person entering and consuming in it. After arriving at the restaurant by train, he found that there had already been an extremely long line outside. Nevertheless, he still adhered to queue up with a view to feasting on the palatable cuisines there. Eventually, he made it to step into the restaurant, having a grand meal, with three hours waiting for it. Such an insanity was it to queue up for spending quite a long time.

In my perspective, it is literally a crazy determination that there are a myriad of people decide to await until they are able to enter the restaurant or else. When elapsing, time is irreversible. Therefore, it is of crucial importance to manage the time to do the more imperative things, rather than merely waiting in line and wasting time. Were it not for queuing up, people could have had an opportunity to complete something meaningful. Indulging themselves into the awe-inspiring natural sceneries is far more fabulous. Moreover, some people queue up for something by virtue of being motivated by transient fads. As the fads vanish, what they have done would be inconsequential. Hence, cherish every subtle part of time for the purpose of pursuing significant objectives, and never allow the time to slip away from your hands.
