

3. I am definitely a foodie. Revelling in mouth-watering treats never fails to intoxicate me with ecstasy. Thus, if there are any famous delicacy, I will more than willing to wait for a long time just to give it a try. My mother, who also puts much emphasis on eating is my good partner, and we often explore newly opened restaurants together, which often gave us a sense of achievement when we find one. Once, we knew from the TV that there was a newly opened pasta restaurant near our home and we decided to have it as our lunch. However, what came into our views when we got the restaurant was a lone building under seidge by throngs of people. My mother suggested that we come next time but I was eager to try it. As a result, we stood in the line and started waiting. The time dragged and my mother became restless. Nevertheless, my heart was filled with joy and excitement. After waiting for two solid hours, it was finally our turn. We walked in the restaurant in a jubilant mood and relish the laid-back atmosphere in the restaurant. To my ^{disappointment}, after another one hour, I walked out the restaurant in a gloomy mood. It turned out that this lunch became one of the most horrible experience^{of mine}. The waitress provided poor service while the pasta was too salty and unfresh.

The experience teaches me that the amount of people waiting for a restaurant doesn't equal how great it is. It is especially true in this social-networking era since we were often misled by a kaleidoscopic variety of new information and advertisements. It also teaches me that I shouldn't always followed the crowd. Not only when I am choosing a restaurant for lunch but also when I am making decisions. Since I am exposed to a colossal amount of knowledge the ability to think independently becomes particularly important. The mainstream media of 21st century definitely have overwhelming advantage against the traditional ones. Thus, it becomes essential for us to learn to be a qualified modern citizen. Despite the fact that it was a terrible experience, it is also thought-provoking.
