News play an essential role in our daily lives, which not only offer <sup>information of</sup> affairs around the world but also may make you more knowledgeable. The bar chart above demonstrates the statistics over the percentage of different <sup>news</sup> categories that 18 to 29-year-old youths in America focus on. The categories of Environment and Natural Disaster and Social Issues accounted for the most, which both exceeded <sup>over</sup> 50%. On the contrary, <sup>the percentage of</sup> School and Education and Art and Cultural relatively declined, and the latter even merely reached 30%. Based on the percentage from the bar <sup>chart</sup>, we can infer that people tend to pay more attention to the news concerning their daily lives, and vice versa.

As far as I'm concerned, Social Issue is the category that I focus <sup>on the</sup> most. Since I am in an age of 18, I progressively realize that I should learn to hold accountable for myself now. I have to pave the way for my future career, and understanding what had occurred on the society then became one of the indispensable matters. By reading those news, I can mature myself when pondering on the distinct voices over a controversial issue. At the same time, I would gradually establish my value and decide how I should lead my life. On the other hand, news regarding Art and Culture is the one I least take care of. Undoubtedly, art can purify our soul and lead us to a creative world. However, after all, it's relatively irrelevant to my life. Therefore, it just serves as a relief to relax myself from time to time. To sum up, though we have our own tendency to different news, it's no need to confine ourselves to particular categories. After all, they can offer us various aspects of information and cultivate us to learn to view the world with more diverse perspectives.
