The bar chart provided is about youngsters' awareness toward a diversity of news in USA. We can easily tell from the picture that youngsters pay attention to news about environmental and natural disasters as well as social issues the most. The reason for it is probably because these kinds of things happen everyday and they're issues which most people are familiar with, so it's understandable that over sixty percent of the youngsters follow relevant news. On the other hand, ^{news about} art and culture garner the lowest percentage, which is only 30%. As for other kinds of news, such as international affairs, entertainment and celebrities as well as education, they are in the middle position, receiving the percentage from around 50% to 60%.

Personally, the news I've been placing the most attention to is the one ^{about} social issues. Since our generation is about to inherit the world from our parents, it's of tremendous significance for us to always keep an eye on everything happening around us, and social issues is undoubtedly sure to be put in priority. By obtaining more understanding about the world and society we live in, we could come up with several novel ideas and arrive at decent solutions to improve ^{present} situation. Conversely, I put very little interest in news about entertainment and celebrities, for I am disapprove of the tendency in which the mass media report about the personal life of famous figures, which I consider to be a violation of personal privacy. In a nutshell, as we're going to be the master of the world in the near future, turning blind and being indifferent to things happening around us is doubtlessly the last thing to do.
