

With the approaching of the Chinese New Year, a number of department stores were having discount on their merchandises. Looking at the advertisement on the television, John couldn't resist the temptation of such low prices. He grabbed his wallet and rushed to the department store. In front of the department store are thousands of people. John could see excitement on everyone's face. As soon as the door was opened, the crowd flocked in the store so as to buy things they wanted. John was pushed forward and almost fell down. Once getting into the store, he found it difficult to move since there were people everywhere. John went to the clothes department first, where he bought ten different clothes owing to the appealing prices. Next, he went to the book store, where he also spent a great deal of money because every book on the shelf looked so attractive that he just couldn't help but put them in his shopping cart. From first floor to the top floor, wherever John went, he found something he desired and took out his wallet without a doubt. John ran out of cash when he was shopping, but that didn't stop him because he had three credit cards.

When coming home, John was tired and exhausted. He went to sleep immediately. In the next morning, John woke up and saw piles of things he bought yesterday. He started to classify those things. He discovered that most things he bought weren't what he needed. Some of them were even completely useless to him, and he just bought them because they were cheap. After watching the bill on the table, John could hardly stand still since he had spent more than forty thousand dollars yesterday. Obviously, the low prices drove him crazy. John regretted that he bought those things on impulse. He should have thought twice when spending money, and he had no choice but to call his mom for help due to a lack of money. His mother blamed him seriously and took away his credit cards. It really taught him a lesson that people should learn to resist the temptations. Although buying a lot of things did bring him happiness, he still had to face the music ultimately.
