

The moment the gates were opened, an influx of crowds rushed into the store. Everyone had long been looking forward to the annual anniversary when most goods would be on sale. My mom and I were also in the crowds.

Knowing that the event would attract a colossal number of people, we headed to the store far more earlier than its opening, only to find so many people were already waiting... desperately in front of the gates. We went to the clothes area immediately. Nevertheless, the building was filled with people, pushing and bumping into others, and cared nothing but reaching their destination. In such a chaos, I got lost. Hard as I tried to stretch my neck to look for my mother, it was simply in vain since I was too short.

Such nervousness filled my veins. I was forced to 背面可繼續作答

小个侍書局考生姓名、應試號碼或與合案無關之文字或付號。

move forward by the crowd, yet I didn't know which direction I should take. To my great relief, I saw a coffee shop on the corner. I managed through the crowds and could finally breathe in fresh air. However, the problem wasn't solved yet. I had to find my mother. Out of the blue, a scream burst out among the crowds. I jumped out of my seat, ^{and} dashed ^{to the scene} to see what had happened. I could see a woman, with many bags in ^{her} hands, fainted on the ground. Not able to see it ^{more} clearly, I started to worry whether it was my mother. When I got to the scene, I gave out a sigh of relief to see my mother standing next to the fainted woman. I ran to her and threw my arms around her. Seconds later, my mother said that we should help the woman, for the crowds showing no concern. We called the ambulance and waited until it came. We accompanied her to the hospital. Fortunately, the woman regain her consciousness soon. Learning that her condition was fine, my mother and I went home gladly. Although we didn't get much goods at the ^{annual} anniversary, I felt so proud of myself to have helped someone in need.

裝訂區切勿作答