"All right, everyone, please settle down, the store will open shortly," the employee yelled through a megaphone. Complaints rose from the crowd of people who had been waiting for the store to open since last night. The employee glanced back at his boss, who gave him a curt nod. Seeing this, the employee signalled for his co-workers to open the doors. As soon as the doors opened, the crowd let out a cheer and surged inside the building, each person intent on buying the items they desired. Within a matter of minutes, the entire store was filled to the brim with people, barely leaving any room for movement. The store erupted into chaos, with people snatching objects off the shelves and squeezing through tight aisles, which more often than not resulted in a collision with someone else. The employee and his co-workers tried to maintain order, but it was impossible to do so over the noise.

Before long, items began to sell out, and an angry mob formed near the information center, demanding the store to restock on the items that were already sold out. Although the employee explained countless times that it was impossible for the store to restock immediately, the customers still weren't satisfied. Thus, a few days after that fiasco of a work day, the employee noticed that the reviews regarding the store had become mostly negative, and that the ratings had plummeted to an all-time low. The number of customers were also decreasing by the day, and the sales and stock numbers were abysmal. The store was forced to close its doors permanently, and the employee along with his co-workers lost their jobs as a result. It was quite an unfortunate turn of events that ended in the worst way possible, both for the store and for the employee.
