The campus is where students spend most of their weekdays at. Maintaining the safety of it is no doubt a vital task. How much trust a student gives to the environment they are at strictly relates to their academic performances. Studying at a place that doesn't pose a threat to their personal safety every once in a while, is much better than one that is packed with school violence, worn-out facilities and loose security. School violence is very common in modern day campus, whether it is fighting over an argument, or even worse, bullying. With schools these days often built well over several decades, the infrastructure, buildings and equipment may hide dangers that are unexpected. A sudden earthquake can easily tear down a fragile building, putting students' and teachers' life on the line. Some schools' securities at the main entrance doesn't have a lot of function. If a stranger slips in, taking away valuable properties of the school, or even commit even more severe crime, the loose security system is to blame, for it can be avoided with greater caution.

As a student myself, I have either seen these problems in daily life or seen them on the news, and each of them have a practical solution. School violence is often left untreated because of the lack of support from the teachers. Knowing a student's behavior and characteristics is basic for a home-room teacher. Solving the conflict or stopping a bullying scene doesn't help much. Going deep with the student's everyday life and give advice on the way is much more effective. Out of date buildings and equipments should be the school's responsibility. As said, a safe learning environment is vital for academic performance. The school should hire professionals to give regular inspection on the school's overall structure stability, and use the money at hand to update the worn-out equipments. Lastly the security systems should also be on the hands of the school. Hiring security guards that actually do their job and installing quality security systems around the campus is necessary. If something big happened that needed security camera footage, and turned out the image was too blurry for any use, than why even install it at the first place? Maintaining campus safety is not an easy task, but if the right people are willing to dedicate their effort, I believe change will be made.
