On a lovely spring day, the birds are chirping happily and white clouds are floating in the clear blue sky. A mild breeze blows through a lovely garden, where there are all kinds of eye-catching flowers blooming. "What a wonderful day," I thought, as I stood by the garden. But as I noticed more and more people arriving to see the beautiful blossoms, the visitors ignored the sign saying "Welcome to take pictures, but NO TRESPASSING!" They tramped over those flowers like they were just dirt in the mud, and only cared if their friends and families took pretty photos of them. I sighed with disappointment upon seeing that.

We learn from books and from teachers that we should have compassion for others since we were little, but do we really show what we learn in our daily lives or do we ignore them and only think of what we want selfishly? I could merely imagine the sadness on the garden's owner's face and the flooding tears upon seeing the destroyed garden he built with his bare hands. Instead of making the owner sad, what we should do is be thankful that somebody made the garden a pretty view, so that we could enjoy seeing, and not doing what the sign told us not to. As the saying goes, "Think twice before you leap.", I think that we should all consider if the action we are making would hurt somebody or not, and this is the lesson I learned after visiting this garden.
