Dear Ken,

I've heard that you've been addicted to video games recently, and I think it is true. I can tell from your recent abnormal behavior. You used to pay full attention to every class in school and play basketball with us after school. However, for the past few weeks, I've seen you dozing off during the class more than a dozen times! You didn't have enough sleep, did you? Recently, you rushed home immediately even without saying goodbye to us after school. This was not the optimistic, accommodating, enthusiastic Ken I've known for years! I'm so worried that exactly what has become of you? You also said that you've been scolded by your parents for your recent poor grades. That was ridiculous you know because you used to be the smartest among us, didn't you?

I'm not here for giving you another reprimand for your wrongdoing like the teachers did but for some sincere, advisable suggestions. After all, we used to be best friends, right? I can imagine how attractive and addicting video games are, really. I've played before, and that's why I'm not telling you not to touch video games for good. As the clichéd proverb goes, "All work and no play makes Jack a dumb." However, you still should not devote all your precious time to those entertainment and pay no attention to your study instead. Promise me, try to strike a wise balance between study and play, please. We worry about your health a lot as well. You seemed to stay up late every night for weeks! Take your health into consideration, alright? All your friends, especially I, miss you so much. We miss the funny Ken always bringing us laughters, the versatile Ken not only having good academic performance but also good at sports, and the Ken who doesn't fully indulge himself in video games. We are all looking forward to having lunch with you and playing basketball with you. You will come back to us and lead the normal life you used to live, right?

Your Best,

Jack
