Dear Ken,

As one of your bestfriends, I feel that I have the obligation to help you switch to the right path on account of your miserable condition now. In retrospect, I was the very person who introduced you the paradise of video games. However, little did I expect that you would end up getting hooked on them and putting your studies aside. What's worse, you even put your parents in extreme agonies. Take an example of me, I have always considered video games an approach of recreation rather an <sup>playing</sup> obstacle against my studies.

Realistically speaking, in this stage of life, we can never be too diligent to study. Accordingly, it's high time that you learned how to strike a balance between your studies and pastime. First and foremost, you have to accept the idea that playing video games is by no means more vital than your present studies. What's more, playing video games can take up too much time and eventually leads to <sup>the</sup> lack of exercise. Last but not least, wouldn't it be fantastic to have you parents wear smiles on their faces with contentment? I understand how much depressed you will be to play less videos games; however, you will grow to know that it is worthwhile. I cross my fingers that you will turn over a new leaf. Remember, nothing is impossible to a willing <sup>soon</sup> heart!

Sincerely yours,
Jill
