Dear Ken,

I just heard that you have been spending all of your time on video games from your parents. They also told me that you have been staying up late every night and have neglected your school work. I am very sorry to hear this. As your cousin and your best friend I hope I can offer you some advice and share my experience with you.

I understand that video games are very fun. In fact, when I was in high school I was so addicted to it that I often skip school and go to internet cafes to enjoy them. I thought this was a cool thing to do and encouraged some of my classmates to do it too. However, it wasn't long before I found that I had difficulty keeping up in class. My parents were so worried about me that they even found me a tutor. Feeling their love and care, I began to feel guilty for my horrible deed. About a month later, I decided to come clean with them. I told them everything. By the end of my confession, I was in tears. Contrary to my expectation, they hugged me and told me everything was going to be fine. They said they were glad that their son was a honest and brave person who is not afraid of confronting his own mistakes. After this incident, my parents and I were closer than ever. I told them every problem I faced at school and shared all my worries with them. Even now, I still call my parents every other day to tell them the difficulties that I encounter at work.

I hope you bear in mind that your parents <sup>only</sup> scolded you because they love you and wish you can focus on your school work. I learned from my experience that playing those video games is just a waste of time. So please take my advice and try to quit video games. It may be hard but I have faith in you. If you have any problems or need to talk to somebody about your worries, don't hesitate to call me

Love,

Jack
