Well goes the proverb, "Misfortune may be a blessing in disguise." However, situations differ tremendously due to the misfortunes ^{a man} encountered.

Nowadays, as technology improved, smartphones have begun to gain popularity among adolescents. It is not unusual to see student walking with their earphones on or putting their attention on smartphones while ^{strolling} on the streets. Commonly, these behaviors are considered dangerous and inappropriate. However, the case for Jack and Jill led to an entirely different result.

Jack and Jill were brother and sister who were both high school students at the year 2000. ^{That day,} they were, as usual, walking to school. Jack was walking in a bright mood with his earphones on. Jill, on the other hand, was using her smartphone.

Then came the accidents. Jill, who wasn't paying much attention to her surroundings, bumped right into a tree. What's worse, a beehive dangling from one of the ^{tree} branches fell off, and thus led to the outrush of these aggressive venomous species, stinging Jill all over. Meanwhile, Jack, who hadn't noticed the "beep" sound of a car travelling at high speed behind him, got hit by the car, leading to his permanent limp and profound blindness. They were both sent to the hospital for medical treatment at the instant. However, the accidents did not lead them to despair and sorrow. They then found their interests in bees and earphones. Years later, with the book Bee-ctionary ^{that} Jill published to introduce the behaviors of bees, and Jack's invention of earphones the can play music and send in ^{traffic} alerts at the same time, they won themselves the Nobel Prize in 2020.

Jack and Jill stated in an interview recently though that they both regretted using electronic devices while walking on the streets, but there wouldn't be these magnificent discoveries if they hadn't come by the accident. To sum up, Jack and Jill strongly recommended: adolescents to take off their earphones and put away their smartphones so as to keep away from ^{possible} deaths and injuries.
