Chinese tradition demands that women be servile to their husbands and be solely responsible for the attendance to household environment. However, people nowadays have begun to recognize "family" as an integral whole. The pith of such concept lies in the keywords "sharing and caring." In my opinion, it's more important for family members to acknowledge their moral duties to the family and always remain supportive, while actually prescribing a list that arranges the allocation of household-chose duties seem rather otiose. When one family member has work at hand, those in leisure can perhaps go mop the floor or do the dishes. Such type of collaboration lasts longer than any sort of regulation since it rises from one's heart and one's will.

This is exactly the way my family works. Household chores can be exhausting, but since both my parents and I understand that its a means towards better living quality, we never grudge to spare our time and labor whenever there are chores to be done. it; if I spot greasy plates on the table with leftovers on it, I'd just clean them up. The <sup>same</sup> goes for my parents. I have developed the habit of doing household chores since an early age, and though it sometimes bothers me — especially when I have to force myself out of the sofa in times of fatigue — I remind myself that this is what pulls a family together. After all, a clean house always brightens the mood, and as we're all sheltered under the same roof, a good mood surely helps us live in harmony and bliss, driving away brawls and conflicts!
