I believe that chores should be shared by each member of the household. It's simply unfair to expect a single person to take care of everything from taking out the trash to mopping the floor. These tasks are usually dull and time-consuming, and they're capable of driving one crazy if one needs to spend an unreasonable amount of time on them. In addition, I think that each family member has the obligation to pitch in to help around the house. Chores need to be done to ensure a properly-functioning household, from which everyone in the family can benefit from and appreciate. Therefore it's only natural for each individual to share a piece of the burden of doing chores; after all, it's the atmosphere of your own family you're working hard to maintain! My ideal household, consequently, would have a system that includes each family member in the management of chores.

My household operates under an autonomous chore-doing system. Nobody is assigned to one particular job. Instead, each family member volunteers to take on a job when something requires being done. For example, my mother might volunteer to do the laundry, but the task of hanging the laundry to dry will fall to either myself, or my brother. The same "rule" can be applied to taking out the trash, or mopping the floor. The burden of doing chores never falls upon one single person, and I really appreciate this system. When I do chores, it feels less of a burden and more of a voluntary action to help maintain the environment of the house. When I'm washing the dishes, for instance, I don't whine or complain about it because I know I'll be living in a much more comfortable environment once the stack of dirty dishes has disappeared. Overall, my belief is that everyone should take part in doing chores. Sure, scrubbing the toilet or emptying trash cans may seem like nasty, undesirable jobs, but if we view our labor as something that can benefit our households, doing chores can turn into a pleasant task.
