It was finally a nice day with the lovely sun shining brightly in the azure sky after a whole week of pouring rain. The Lin family gathered around the car could barely hide their excitement because they had been looking forward to their postponed family trip since the first rainy day. Mrs. Lin was holding their daughter's hand, waiting in front of the car, while Mr. Lin was loading their car with luggages, humming a catchy song to himself.

However, what they didn't expect was the heavy traffic on the way to their destination. With a lot of cars on the highway, the Lin family's vehicle could hardly move an inch. It had already been an hour, but they didn't even drive a kilometer. The impatient honk could be heard everywhere, thrusting harshly through the windows into the Lin family member's ears. The two adults were tired and frustrated, while their little daughter remained high spirit in the back seat.

It was after a four-hour long driving that they finally arrived at their destination. The little girl hopped off the car as soon as her father parked the car, dragging her parents with her to the grand palace-like museum she had dreamt of visiting the moment she saw it on an advertisement. However, after seeing countless people flocking in front of the building, even the cheerful little girl started to turn her lips downward. All of them knew that there was nearly impossible that they could walk through the crowd, not to mention getting tickets to the museum. The little girl felt depressed, but she tried hard to stay positive, knowing her parents were even more pissed because they failed to have a happy family trip.

Beaming brightly, the little girl told her parents that she was hungry. The Lin family went to a beautiful restaurant with a big garden outside the main building. While taking their orders, the waitress said that they could have fun in the garden before their meals were done. Enjoying the breathtaking view, the Lin family gradually became happier. With the relaxing fragrance the flowers emitting, the Lin family regained their smiles. Holding hands with each other, they felt content even though they didn't get to go inside the museum. After all, the point of a family trip didn't lie in the places they visited, but in the company of family, which was exactly what they had.
