

An enchanting fragrance may make someone unforgettable and look forward to possessing it again desperately. However, can a bad odor fascinate someone? In my memory, the most unforgettable smell is the smell of sweat, mixed with the effort and perseverance of my classmates during the senior high school athletic meet. The smell, though not very pleasing or charming, was a symbol of our fond memories in our last athletic meet in senior high. It came from our happiness when winning the first prize and from our sorrow when failing to beat our contestants. When I smelled this kind of smell, I thought that it was my blessing to have so many good friends, enjoying every moment we got along.

The smell of sweat still live in my memories. As time went by, we good classmates, or good friends were destined to separate, because it is time we graduated. In this scorching hot summer day, every time I go to do exercising, I will always recall the time we gathered together, smiling and chatting also in a hot-blooded school activity. As sweat slides down my face, the smell fills the atmosphere which makes me smile, retrospectively every naive face. Though we classmates are unlikely to play with each other every moment, the smell of sweat, combined with those old happy days, will certainly make me feel pleasant every time I smell it!
