Your cheek is burning with embarrassment after delivering a dreadful speech in front of a crowd, and you are fervently praying that somehow you could become invisible. We all have moments like this. And people may all at some points in life yearn for a device that allows them to disguise themselves and cushion them from harm's way. Therefore, if I were granted the opportunity to choose between the invisibility cloak and smart glasses, I would leap at the chance of having an invisibility cloak. I have been fascinated by the idea that someone might be able to become invisible in other people's eyes since I read Harry Potter in elementary school. The concept of disguising myself with a cloak has held an allure to me ever since. And after so many cases of stammering while delivering a speech in public or tripping over my feet in front of people, not to mention my being rejected by the boy I had a crush on in fifth grade, I would count having an invisibility cloak as a great blessing. Besides, its protection feature can fill me with a sense of invincibility as well! I would use the cloak to avoid unpleasant people, escape dreadful situations and maybe create some tranquil moments without being bothered by other people.

How satisfactory it would be to get my hands on this cloak!

While I have high regards of the invisibility cloak, my attitude towards the smart glasses is dubious. Sure, it would be useful to see things without the hindrance of any blocks or buildings. And it would be helpful to have a gadget that records everything you've been through. But the smart glasses have its own set of problems. First is its feature of enabling people to have a 'penetrating gaze'; since we cannot deter people from letting their gazes wander to private places like bathrooms, some perverts may commit the device to improper use. What's more, I don't think people need a device which can record every little detail in our lives. We already have numerous gadgets such as cell phones and cameras for that. As a result, I believe that the smart glasses have little practical use while having the ^{potential to} trigger many social problems. I don't think it is a good idea to possess a pair of the glasses, except for bragging to one's friends. Thus, it is not worthwhile to have smart glasses, for that I am certain.
