If I were granted a proper opportunity to get one of the two products, I would definitely choose an invisibility cloak. To begin with, people nowadays, inclusive of myself, care way too much about others' opinions. Hence, we feel self-conscious when dragging our footsteps slowly to appreciate what we want to take a close look at. However, with this invisibility cloak, we can enjoy any scenes all the way regardless of by-standers. Second, I have been dying for the encounter of ruthless fires without getting hurt or gruesome scars. The instructions on the invisibility cloak manifestly say it can shield me from being burned by fire, so I make this option to prevent my dream from being a pie in the sky. Lastly, sometimes, when I roam on the streets, I have the urge to recite sonnets as if I were William Shakespeare and sing to my heart's content. Owning such a high-tech product, I can ward off being teased by pedestrians.

The reasons for my not choosing the other product are as follows. For one thing, life should be a bowl of cherries. When we can predict everything beforehand, life is not that intriguing. For another, I would like to savor all the occurrences in person instead of foreseeing it. I will be moved by an unknown event, but I will feel bored with reasonable matters. Last but not least, I am a man of the spirit of adventure. I like to clear the hurdle in front of me, further catching a glimpse of what it is hid behind despite ferocious creatures or aliens. I worship the spirit of Hamlet to some extent. I even admire Faust in terms of his desire for knowing everything. With these models, I firmly believe that it is true to be adventurous. Hence, I merely need my own eyes rather than smart glasses. In a nutshell, smart glasses will cloud the vision of humans, while invisibility cloaks will create a kaleidoscopic world.
