

According to the diagram, high school students in America spend most of their time sleeping and attending activities about learning. What's more intriguing is that they apply themselves to social activities and recreation for at least three to four hours. It's also crystal clear that students in America spend more time sleeping than students in Asia. However, the most interesting to me is that in accordance with the diagram, students in America devote themselves to part-time jobs for almost two hours every day, which makes me awe at their independence.

Speaking of time management of a day, I may create a diagram of my own which is quite different to the one I analyzed above. Being a twelfth-grade student in Taiwan, I have a stressful life and keep a fast pace toward my daily life. Confronted with lots of pressure in studies, I dedicate myself to studying for at least half a day. Nonetheless, I never forget to get an eight-hour comfortable sleep every day. While my time is filled with learning and sleeping, I cultivate a habit to play badminton with my dearest friends, who also need to prepare for the big test. It takes an hour for us to let ourselves work out, worn out, and laugh out loud after perspiration. Compared with students in America, they have one great difference <sup>against me</sup>: they are active in extracurricular activities, particularly in social activities. Evidently, I hardly spend my day in socializing, which is a pity for me. Although I have plenty of best friends, we have little time to hang out or have our leisure time. All in all, there are diverges between Eastern and Western culture. Whereas students in Asia, like me, are preoccupied with studies and endeavor to achieve higher scores, students in America are engrossed in their recreational activities. Nevertheless, it is impossible to choose which one is better for students. The only thing that we all need to bear in mind is that live our life in the way you want it to be!
