

Looking back on my tiring and stressful senior high school life, I feel fortunate enough to have one thing worth remembering: I have learned how to organize a fund-raising campaign. A typhoon struck Taiwan when I was a volunteering club ^{leader} in senior high school. Members in my club and I wanted to do something for the community, so we decided to contact World Vision Taiwan. The moment they learned what we wanted to do, they promised to help us and assisted us to hold the fund-raising campaign. Since we didn't have the experience of holding this kind of activity, we constantly asked workers in World Vision for help. They taught us that we should first draw up a plan and notify the school authorities about the activity. Besides, we should advertise our activity in various methods, such as flyers and TV advertisement. Following the advice from the workers, we smoothly accomplished the program and successfully raised more than 100 thousand for the victims.

After the fund-raising activity, members in my club and I felt a sense of achievement to contribute to the society. Also, we learned that it requires teamwork as well as individual efforts for things to go together. Furthermore, we have polished our communication skills as well as cooperation abilities during the process, in which we interacted with the workers in World Vision and learned from his valuable experiences. Besides, we are firmly convinced that Taiwanese is a kind-hearted people after the fund-raising campaign. Most important of all, we acquired the idea that we should always learn from whom with in-depth knowledge in that field.
