Never could I forget such a special experience. During last summer vacation, my mother wanted me to help her teach her students to make a unique handicraft. The work was a little difficult. Most students couldn't understand how to do. In the start, I was patient and taught each of them to make the handicraft step by step. However, I lost my temper at last, and I flew into a rage. I just couldn't understand why they couldn't finish such a easy thing. My mom came to tell me, saying that if I wanted to help others, then I should be patient no matter how many times I had to say. Unwilling as I was, I still went back and apologized to them. Much to my surprise, they weren't angry with me, on the contrary, they said they would spare efforts to learn. Ultimately, we made numerous beautiful works, and not only they but also I had learn a lesson.

After undergoing this special experience, I know that I am not patient enough to other. I can't command others to think or do the same with me. Teaching others to learn a new skill is really a big task. We have to tell them how to do from the beginning, and help them to handle the difficulties which they face during the process. However, although it is tiring, I still realize something I don't know. While seeing the person you teach finish the work, a sense of achievement come up from my heart. Only when I see the smiles wearing on the students do I realize teaching others to learn something is such a joyful job.
