Growing up as a single child, I never had the privilege of the comfort from a sibling. As the only kid, all my parents' attention were fixated on me, I guess it's both a blessing and a curse. Since a young age, I've shown great aptitude in learning and have always excelled in school. I've received praises from teachers of all subjects, even my band teacher. Consequently, with great knowledge comes great responsibility, my parents began putting their hopes and dreams on me. Having to carry the burden of my parents' hopes, gone was the leisure time I had with my friends, gone was the happy grin that a companion could give me.

Like a valley girl growing up in the big city, I sometimes felt lonely, as if there was a part missing from my life.

Luckily for me, I've always had a knack for music. Lately, I've been turning to my piano for comfort. I believe that comfort comes in many shapes and form, whether it be the warm hug of a friend, the chirping of birds and sweet summer wind, or the burning feel of your muscles after a long jog. For me, comfort comes in the form of music. I love the feeling of my fingertips flying across the keyboard, and the vibration of music notes through the soles of my feet. When the soothing melody reaches my ears, all the loneliness I felt is washed away without a trace, just like how the waves wash away an imprint in the sand. My piano has been my companion through the lonely days, and it will continue to guide me past the lonesome times.
