A Special Market with Whatever You Want

Farmers are praying for their crops to thrive and be sold out quickly for fear of financial losses. Artists are suffering from the agony that their works are not familiar to people. Residents are pondering how to make full use of their dispensable goods instead of taking them straight to the landfill. With all the problems people encounter above, I see the second project, a special market, as a way to go. It not only meets the needs of most of the residents but also gives a new life to the items which are about to be got rid of. From my prospective, it may not be the perfect way to solve all the problems we have in our daily life, but it sure is a great way for us to take advantage of. Besides, during the time we spend in the market, we can interact more with our neighbors, which we don't usually do in our daily life. Whether we bargain with the vendors or just have some chit-chat with people we meet, it's a good chance for us to keep in touch with the people around us. Thus, a market featuring agricultural produces, handmade crafts, artistic works, and second-handed goods will be the best activity to be held.

As far as I'm concerned, a market that appeals to more potential customers is often equipped with some special events. To the market of our neighborhood, I think it's necessary that it includes a special museum that tells about the story of our neighborhood. It can be featured with the history of our neighborhood, our special agricultural produces, and the important figures that contribute a lot to the place we live. As a result, not only will this museum enable the guests to better understand our history but it will also make the residents proud of the neighborhood they live in. As for the market, people will be able to trade freely even without currencies. It will aim to make full use of what we have, so nothing will be banned from appearing in the market while people can get anything they want in the market. All in all, if this market successfully shapes up, it will definitely be a great activity that all of the residents can recall with smile after the event.
