According to the diagram displayed, environment and natural disasters is the category receiving the most attention from young Americans, while culture and arts is among the least concerned. Interestingly, the news of international events as well as entertainment and celebrities are equally approved of, reaching almost sixty percent. School and education, on the other hand, is laid a bit less emphasis on, scoring a forty-nine percent.

Out of the six categories, I would pay the most attention to the environment and natural disasters. First of all, what can be more closely related to our lives than the planet we live on? Every day, I depend on the weather forecast to decide how to dress, and know whether typhoons are approaching. Second, with global warming, marine debris, and animal extinction problems in our faces, one cannot care less about the environment and the preventive measures ahead. Third, as long as I am keeping track of the natural disasters worldwide, I'll know better where to send help. Just as many countries helped us during our times of the earthquake crisis, we can do the same and warm countless hearts. However, I would not be as interested in the life and happenings of celebrities as I am in the environment, for what they do aren't linked to my life at all. I won't save an extra life by recognizing the name of some renowned movie star. It's their privacy and their job to earn a living. Why care so much? As a global citizen, it is our responsibility to make the world a better place. For us, there is still much to learn and read about the world in the course of life.
