

The bar graph shows what sorts of news the American youngsters care about the most. Unsurprisingly, news about environmental and natural disasters receives 69% of awareness, for this kind of information has the most direct impact on us and is a matter of life and death. Social Issues, International affairs, and Celebrities also receive 64%, 59%, and 58% of awareness respectively, which is probably because it is essential to know about what's going domestically and internationally, lest you would be left out by the world. The sort of news the Americans care least about is Art and Culture, and it may be caused by our educational system which put little emphasis on such sort of subject.

As for myself, Social issues and International affairs are two of the topics I care about the most. Living in a high-connected global village, we can't just mind our own business; instead, we need to know about the whole world. It is of significant importance that we give a hand to those in need, in regardless of their colors or the language they speak. In this way, we wouldn't be left out when the scenario changed. The least topic I care about is entertainment and celebrities. Indeed, these kinds of news may be entertaining at first, but after I found out how the paparazzi had disturbed the celebrities, I started boycotting these kinds of news. The last thing we should do is to build our happiness on others' pain.
