The given bar graph illustrates how much American teenagers show interest in several certain topics. Organized in a descending order, the diagram can be sorted into three sections. First, environmental and natural disasters received the most attention, followed by social issues which possess over sixty percents. Next, we are looking at the medium part where international affairs and celebrities both attract over half of the youngsters' attention. Last, education and culture ranked last, with only forty nine and thirty percent respectively of the U.S teenagers find interesting about. To sum up, natural disasters and social issues are the most popular topics, while few teenagers show interest in education and arts.

Among the six topics, there are also some that I tend to show concern and interest in during my leisure time. As we are living in a global village where we can get easy access to international headlines and hot issues, I prefer keeping myself abreast of international events and affairs. Whether the news is about the China-USA trading war, the Brexit referendum or the turmoil and tragedies in the Mid-East, I always make sure to receive comprehensive information and gain a better understanding of the world I'm living in, thus I can feel like a global citizen who cares about everything around me. I show the least interest in the showbiz industry, for news titles about the dating scandals and the private lives of celebrities never seem to catch my attention. As a busy student leading a bustle life, the most important things to me are the impending A/T and current global events. I am not willing to spare my precious time to care about others' scandals or even the privacies of someone I don't even know. Thus, I never read the celeb section on the newspaper or bother to keep myself aware of trending showbiz topics. As brand-new technology whered in an era of mass information, it is crucial for us youngsters to show attention to news all across the globe and engaged ourselves in the beautiful world out there.
