According to the chart, up to seventy percent of American youngsters pay attention to news about the environment and natural disasters. In addition, more than half of them care about domestic issues and the international affairs. On the other hand, topics related to art and cultures are apparently less appealing to the youths in the America, with only thirty percent of them showing their interest.

Whenever asked what types of news I pay attention to the most, I will answer environmental and natural disasters without hesitation. Living in a modern society, I often see numerous pieces of news covering the rivers contaminated by factories, the polluted air, and tons of wastes we have created. What's worse, even the mountainous areas are being plagued by deforestation, and the marine life is threatened by overfishing. In my opinion, humans are ought to live in harmony with nature. Thus, I often watch news about the topic to keep up with the current situation our mother nature is in, and do what I can do for her. When it comes to the type of news I pay less attention to, it is entertainment and celebrities. Since I have no particular liking for any super star or politician, I don't care about where they go or what they wear every day. Moreover, if a celebrity has negative covers, such as having an affair or becoming a drug addict, he or she becomes a bad example for people in the society. Therefore, I would rather watch less news related to the celebrities. To sum up, I firmly believe that whatever kinds of news people are interested in, we should all keep abreast of the current affairs and make the world a better place to live in, not only for humans, but also for every living creature.
