

I firmly believe in the importance of strengthening school security. Only when school security is fortified can students fully possess their constitutional right of receiving education. The most common security matter has something to do with a undiscovered break-in, especially at night. After the burglars sneak into the campus, students' and teachers' possession may be stolen. What's worse, if the criminals hide in some distant zones on campus, students' safety is probably at peril. As is seen on the news, a little girl found the criminal hiding at her elementary school; then she was brutally beheaded. To prevent these horrible events from occurring, we must take school security seriously and defend the essential constitutional right for students.

There are several measures that can be put into practice. First of all, the school authorities have to build up reliable CCTV system throughout the campus. This way, the criminals will be spotted upon stepping into the school. Second, with a view to making the school security measures more well-rounded, the patrol of school guards must be faithfully executed. Under the tight surveillance, the criminals who successfully broke in is very likely to be caught on the spot. Last but not least, all the school members are supposed to make sure they have all the doors and windows loked up after leaving the classroom or office. This can also drastically reduce the possibility of their belongings being stolen. After all of the measures above are put into practice, the school security will be strengthened very much. I solemnly hope everyone on campus can take heed of this issue and that the tragedies will never happen again.
