Campuses are places where students study subjects, interact with peers and cultivate their own personalities, which are crucial for the students' development in the future. Thus, it is self-evident that students should be bred in a carefree environment and no fear be left behind. However, tragedies happening in schools are still ubiquitous scenes in our everyday life. For instance, bullying accounts for the largest proportion of safety problems. Out of rage, hatred or jealousy, some may go to extremes to hurt their classmates, deteriorating the victims' confidence by repeatedly intimidate them. Another major safety problem lies in substance abuse. Some students can't resist the lure of smoke or drugs. What's worse, they may traffic these illegal items into campus and sell them, which poses a striking threat to students' physical and mental health.

As a student on campus, I can't sit back and watch such phenomenon ruining my beloved place. Therefore, I will definitely call for effective measures to combat against it. First, inflict heavier penalties on those who violate school regulations is a must, which not only protects the safety of students but also stops the re-engagement in bully or drug-trafficking. Next, the combination between teachers and students plays an important role in nipping in the bud. Through continual education on the topic of mutual trust and respect, it is statistically proven that the rate of campus bullying drops drastically since everyone learns more about caring for others and puts his or herself into others' shoes. With the effort of punishing those who endanger others' safety and moral lectures that better students' temperament, I firmly believe that one day, campuses will be free from fear and anguish, becoming^{places} where people can grow up merrily.
