

It was an invigorating morning with myriads of blooms generously showing their captivating fragrance and bold, bright, vibrant colors in Yangmingshan. In early spring, tourists, even local residents, are willing to get up at six, and take a hike here to feel the vigorous atmosphere. As a land owner with acres of gardens here, I especially enjoy seeing people capturing my marvelous flowers which have taken me numerous days and nights to take care of. However, things go downhill when my garden is overflowing with people. I still remember that morning when my fragile gardenias were finally in bloom. A merciless woman, however, stepped on them directly. What's more, although I had set up a huge sign to ask tourist not to step in my gardens, none of them could refrain themselves from entering to take a close shot with my flowers! Couples were stamping while a crowd of middle-age women intruded into the garden. Some beautiful ladies with rosy outfits trampled on my precious roses while some teenagers broke the branches, picking my adorable tulips away. The paradise was crowded with demonic tourists.

As the owner of my gorgeous flowers, this kind of behavior is unacceptable. First, I understand that people get excited when seeing a sea of flowers. Yet, it doesn't mean that they're all yours! It's a basic respect of not touching other people's possessions without permission, not to mention destroying or stealing them. On top of that, warning signs are there for a reason. Sticking to regulations and warnings is crucial not just for one person, but for the entire society. Once these vulnerable blossoms are sabotaged, other visitors will lose the chance to appreciate the splendid view. Last but not least, selfishness is what prompted these people to do so. For the purpose of boasting on social media and presenting the best picture, they even ignored the effort and time spent in cultivating and maintaining these flowers, which is a rather selfish act. After all, the fascinating beauty of blooms needs everyone to protect, or else the breathtaking view will no longer exist.
