

Various places around Taiwan are known for their beautiful seasonal flowers. Nature lovers enjoy the dainty petals fluttering in the wind and the sweet perfumes permeating the air. But recently, as picture-sharing applications have risen in popularity and Internet celebrities have appeared, the intentions of those who visit these flower fields aren't just about nature. Determined to follow trends and get a picture others will envy, they ignore the signs politely asking them to keep off the fields, trampling the greenery to their heart's content, and leave ruins behind.

As the owner of one such flower field, I am angered that this phenomenon has remained a problem unsolved for far too long. First of all, it's a violation of property. I did not give these people permission to enter my field, which is personal property. Therefore, I can file lawsuits for trespassing and property damage. Second, I had already put up a sign asking them to refrain from entering and stepping on the plants. It shows how selfish these people are, not caring that their one step can cause damage that takes a long time to repair. With such a lack of morals and compassion, I fail to see how these hooligans are citizens that have received the same schooling as we did! Last of all, these people's actions show how they fail to respect life, and how inhumane they are. Though plants do not speak and actively move, they are alive, and therefore lives. Every step they so brazenly take in the fields claim several lives, not including the insects that take shelter within the greenery.

We are mortals, driven by our selfish desires in a world of sensual lures. But it does not mean we cannot fight the flaws of mortality, learn to think for others, and awaken the warmth of humanity. If those trampling the flower fields had such thoughts, they might have reconsidered their actions.
