

Spring is the season of flowers and butterflies. Crowds of tourists were flocking into the fabulous garden to catch a glimpse of its beauty. Upon arriving the tourist attraction, different types of flowers came into view. There were cherry blossoms in full bloom, sun flowers greeting people enthusiastically, and colorful butterflies dancing gracefully. In order to capture the magnificent scene, tourists began stepping into the garden and taking pictures with the gorgeous surroundings. However, all of them ignored the signs which warned people not to step on the flowers and destroy them. The tourists were so selfish that they satisfied themselves through damaging the environment. As a result, after they finished their visits, the only thing left was the painful flowers crying in the garden, with few butterflies mourning for the tragedy and suffering they had gone through. Those who had to accept the loss were the owners of the garden, not those mean visitors. Furious at their selfishness, as one of the visitors, I would like to say something to the public.

Everyone has the rights to enjoy the beauty of nature. These treasures in tourist attraction don't belong to a single visitor. Thus, it is definitely the visitors' responsibilities to protect the environment from being destroyed. When relaxing in the garden, we should follow the rules written on the signs. In addition, we should pay heed of our behavior for fear of hurting the flowers, especially when taking photos. If there are people violating the rules, don't hesitate to correct them and remind them to be careful of the environment. I am extremely disappointed to see what happened there. I am sorry for not being able to stop those visitors from hurting the flowers. Hence, I would like to urge everyone to be friendly to the natural beauty, whereby we can better explore the world of nature. As long as we human beings work together to protect the environment, I firmly believe that the world will absolutely be filled with more cuteness of nature.
