Last spring, I was among the flock of tourists visiting Yangmingshan National Park because of the flower festival. At first, my family members and I visited only because of a news introduction of the event. Since it seemed to have attracted tons of visitors, we should also take a look in person. Not until we arrived at the vast field of purple flowers did we realize how splendid they were. "The seemingly endless flowers were the masterpiece of a farmer living nearby," one of the tourists said. Stunned, I started to take photos of the amazing scenery in order to seize the moment through my camera. At the same time, I noticed that a group of people entered the field and started to take selfies and post the ^{photos} online. However, a sign in front of me showed "Welcome tourists to take photos, but please, do not step into the field!" What's worse, more and more visitors followed them, despite the fact that they did read the sign.

I felt regretful. Though I didn't follow, it seems that there were things I could do to protect the scenery. We, who didn't violate the regulation, should stand out and stop others to do so. Even just by notifying them can sometimes make a difference. As for this event, it was a perfect display of the bandwagon effect. It was the first few people who led the rest to neglect the restriction. If all of the tourists have thought clearly before following, there would have been less people in the field stepping over the flowers. In addition, we should think about other's feeling, the owner for example, before fulfilling our own contentment. All in all, I have learned to make a difference by affecting others and putting myself in others' shoes.
