The advent of the blossom season attracted humongous amount of tourists. Attractions of flowers swarming with people have had serious impact on the gorgeous ecology. Regardless of the warning sign saying "Viewing and taking pictures without trampling", people neglected the regulation and tried to get a taste of ^{an experience of} closely seeing the flower ocean. It hasn't dawned on them that wound-ridden flowers were under their thoughtless feet, begging them to stop the brutality. Unfortunately, myriads of people went on this trend, fearing that they couldn't leave charming pictures as others did. Little did they know their actions were leading to a vicious circle.

As the owner of this enchanting land bursting with flowers, I was tremendously heart-broken. Although the business opportunities behind might generate numerous profits to my garden, the destroy brought by the visitors would definitely jeopardize the environment, which is the least I expected. I wondered that if the government could implement a strict regulation concerning tourism and environmental protection, because owners of attractions usually don't have that much of power to prohibit people from undermining the environment. Though strict rules might serve as a double-edged sword, decreasing the number of tourists while preserving the ecology, it is incumbent upon us to protect the environment since we are all members of the world.
