In recent years, Taiwan <sup>colleges</sup> are entering a paradigm-shift from Chinese-speaking classes to English-speaking <sup>classes</sup>. I totally agree with this change. To begin with, it is an established fact that English is the international language and most of the modern technology stemmed from the western world. Therefore, by learning our major in English, we can get rid of mistakes such as mistranslations. In other words, we are granted <sup>with</sup> the opportunity to obtain knowledge from the author or the professor directly. Moreover, learning specialized lesson in English simultaneously show advantages when students entering workplaces. Students can be more competent in communicating with foreign companies and get a better chance for promotion. In conclusion, as learning professional lessons in English enhance our ability, I firmly agree with the trend.

If my major in college will be taught in English, I will definitely make some precautionary measures in response to the change. First of all, it is indispensable for me to improve my English comprehension skills. For example, I will subscribe some English magazines that are related to my major before I enter school. By doing so, I can have a better comprehension for both intricate terms and the knowledge itself. Better still, by preparing beforehand, I can get a better picture of the knowledge when the professor gives us <sup>more</sup> elaborate explanations. On top of that, online videos are also an elixir to success. Thanks to the advancement of technology, every kinds of educational clips can be found in the internet and I can definitely make good use of it. <sup>By</sup> listening to foreign Youtubers, I can also be accustomed to the speed of native English speakers which will be conducive to future learning. In a nutshell, as long as I endeavor in improving my English skills, I will have confidence in English-speaking lessons.
