Recently, many universities in Taiwan encourage professors to lecture their courses in English. As far as I'm concerned, I totally approve of this growing trend. Their are several reasons why I support this change. First and foremost, in today's globalized world, people from all around the world come together and work as a community. It is especially essential for us to get equipped with great command of English, which is the most commonly used language in the world, so that we can communicate with foreigners without obstacles. Secondly, lecturing in English helps us better understand the textbook in certain professional realm which is written in English. Last but not least, many meanings and content and get lost or mistaken through translation. When we mastered the English terms in professional field, we can have critical thinking and can keep abreast of the latest papers and findings ..

With a view to that required courses might be lectured in English in the near future, there are things I can do to face this change. First, I should make myself acquaint with English not only in learning, but also in my free time. I can watch English serials or with subtitles to learn ingenious uses of news report
phrases or vocabulary. Moreover, since we'll be learning the courses through listening, I can try to close the English subtitles and see if I understand what they're talking about. Lastly, I should get familiar with the subject that I'll major in beforehand through autonomic learning. There are many learning resources online such as educational videos, college pre-courses, and informative websites. By looking for information no matter whether it's in English or Chinese, I can get a beforehand understanding of the professional field and a good grip of languages. I believe by lecturing in English and with the assist of ever-advancing information technology, I can learn more throroughly and have a deeper insight into the professional realm.
