With the widespread of English, there are more and more people encourage the usage of English, including several universities. In my humble opinion, I'm on the opposite side of the trend. A few reasons account for it. First and foremost, converting some professional curriculums into courses lectured in English is quite absurd, for the purpose of these classes is aimed at improving the knowledge of students in specific fields instead of English. The trend may put emphasis on the wrong goal. In addition, compared with Chinese, our mother tongue, English shouldn't take the place of Chinese as our language used in daily conversation. We ought to cherish more of our cultural treasure inherited from long before. Last but not least, if the trend becomes a norm for universities to recruit professors, those with extraordinary knowledge in a subject but in absence of the ability to articulate in English may be turned down by colleges. With these reasons mentioned above, I disapprove to the trend of teaching college students professional knowledge in English.

If the designated classes of my major in college are lectured in English, I will take measures to respond. First, I'll drill on my competence in English in the hope of being able to fully understand the classes given by professors. I will listen to radio, such as ICRT, Advanced, BBC, for instance. Second, I'll enhance my skill of taking notes because once the terms mentioned in the class are unfamiliar, the only way for me to deal with the problem is by looking up in a dictionary or searching the Internet, both of which can only be done after classes. As a result, jotting down some piece of information is of great importance. Lastly, I will purchase books concerning my major which are written in English. By doing so, I believe that I will better understand the usage and diction of English in certain field, which will undoubtedly improve myself in my study. In a nutshell, though I oppose the trend of using English to teach knowledge of high level, I'm still ready to cope with the probable future I might be faced with.
