

As the world is becoming more and more interconnected thanks to the advances in technology, English-taught lectures in colleges have obtain great advocacy from the educational sector and many other industries. From my perspective, this trend is, in fact, very positive for our generation. First and foremost, it is an undeniable truth that English, spoken by many westerners, can be regarded as the global language. And taking classes in English can help students to connect to the global market, thus enhancing one's expertise by enriching oneself with knowledge abroad. Secondly, learning in English can, without a doubt, allow Taiwanese students to realistically apply this language to their lives. As excellent as students here in reading, a lot of students are weak in English listening, which is deemed as one of the most significant abilities. By implementing teaching in English, I think this situation can be improved.

Growing up in Taiwan, I have always been looking forward to a class taught in English. And if my compulsory classes are in English, I would, for sure, embark on to perfect my English listening skills. Even though praised by many classmates, my English listening still has a lot of room to progress. Moreover, for the chance of all-English presentation is far from low, I would as well strive to excel at English speaking in advance so as to cope with the tasks our professors assigned to us. Last but equally important, I will go through the contents of textbooks or handouts, since it is a professional session held in English, it is a must that I get acquainted with some materials first and look up to words I don't know in a dictionary. All in all, I consider lectures taught in English a wonderful thing, and if I have the opportunity to get involved, I will surely make it my edge in such a competitive world.
