

2. When it comes to whether professors should teach in English, I ~~totally~~ approve of it. To begin with, since lots of ^{significant} experiments were conducted at English-speaking countries, their research reports and conclusions are ^{all} written in professional English. To teach them in Chinese, translation is required and there is potential that the translators are not educated enough to come up with ^{an} explicit word to replace the original one. Therefore, by teaching in English, the mistake in translation can be avoided and students can acquire the true meaning of the knowledge that the researchers want to tell to the public. In addition, many prestigious colleges or labs are situated in dominant countries such as the US, Germany. Accordingly, if one wants to refine himself and conduct an experiment, he will definitely have to use English to converse with his partners about professional knowledges. Therefore, the professors and colleges have to provide an English-speaking environment to help students practice; thus enabling them to go abroad and seek for better educations. To sum up, the expertise should be taught in English, especially those in scientific area.

To adapt ~~to~~ the classes using English, I will make a meticulous plan. First of all, I will make good use of this summer time to improve my reading ability, for I have to read lots of books written in English. Hence, I will begin with English fictions. Doing so not only can improve my reading speed and ^{increase the} amount of words that I acquire, but it also can make the process more enjoyable, for I can immerse myself in the story. Second, I reckon that ^{my} listening ability has many rooms for improvement, so I will turn to CNN news and try my best to follow the speed of anchors. Most important of all, oral expression is absolutely my biggest weakness. To enhance this indispensable ability in conversation, a class that helps people to speak English is an ideal place for me. Speaking directly to a foreigner is too touch for me. Participating in the class and practicing over and over again, I have confidence that after this summer vacation, I will be proficient in using English.
