

The two pictures given both show a park under a clear, blue sky. The weather is calm and the sun is shining brightly, casting light on the ground. With no people present, the atmosphere is serene and peaceful. However, that's where their similarities end. Though giving off the same cheerful vibe, the park in picture A is packed with man-made facilities such as slides and ladders, while the park in picture B merely consists of natural sceneries like trees and bushes. The function of Park A seems to be a playground for children to play in, where we can imagine myriads of kids and toddlers screaming and laughing while playing tag with one another. By contrast, the towering trees in Park B seem to function as a place where people can rest, chat or read quietly without being disturbed by loud noises. While they are both parks, they certainly have significant differences and serve different purposes.

I am a big fan of nature's wonders and relish the feeling of being surrounded by plants and animals, and hence the park of my dreams would be similar to Park B. Although I enjoy interacting with people, I feel it necessary to have a place of my own where I can enjoy some time alone and reflect on life. My park would be the perfect spot to do so, with rows of tall oak trees providing shelter from the scorching sun, blooming flowers exhibiting a wide variety of colors that lightens up my mood, and a huge lake right in the middle reflecting sunlight and all the wonderful sceneries. Since it is like my secret hiding spot, I would have the entire park to myself, and it would be as if I were the only person left on Earth. As a student leading such a bustle and stressful life, I picture my park to be the magical wonderland where I could escape from the tedious tasks and depressing hindrances that have been stuck in my mind and obstructing my path. Whenever I am on the verge of breaking down, I would hurl myself into the arms of my park, knowing that I can seek refuge in it and that the beauty of nature would work its magic and heal my shattered heart.