

With sunshine reflecting from the metal on the facilities, the park in picture A is glimmering. There are colorful slides and a variety of facilities situated in the park, waiting for energetic children to play on them and have a whale of the time. They may be excited about the feeling of sliding down the slides, or they may be satisfied with the sense of fulfillment after winning an intense game with friends. The park is filled with laughter and joy, which is a heaven for both parents and children, for they can enjoy the playground to their hearts' content. In the contrast, the park in picture B seems to be a place with silence. Sunshine sifts through leaves, making the shiny spots and shades glistering on the ground. The trees are so tall that the upper parts move with mild winds blowing by. Everything is in harmony, and people wandering in this park may immerse themselves in the picturesque scene. They talk in low voices, for fear to break down the silent and tranquil condition.

The aforementioned parks are ubiquitous in our lives, they both bear irreplaceable advantages. Nevertheless, my ideal park barely has similarities with them. With waterfalls dropping from the high cliff, my ideal park situated in the middle of the mountains. Instead of various trees growing, it is known for its pond rearing different kind of cultures. If you step down the water, a feeling of bittercold will surge you from your feet through your spine. You will also feel fishes or crabs kissing your skin, which may lead you to giggles due to the itchy feeling. The reason why this park is my ideal park is that global warming has been damaging Earth, but people seem to be only aware of the importance of growing trees. Few of them care about water resources and biodiversity; therefore, my ideal park is the place that is filled with water and creatures idling around, enjoying their day. If my ideal park exists, people might concern more about global warming rather than just associate it with growing trees.
