

Teenagers of our generation are bound to undergo various concerns and challenges. As a teen myself, I'd definitely like to have a robot helper assist me in resolving my first heartbreak. As an emotionally stable person in most circumstances, I tend to be utterly fragile when it comes to interpersonal relationships. I linger over past conversations, contemplating my own actions; I trap myself in the endless maze of my own memories, refusing to move on. Thus, though I have not yet met my first love, I can totally see myself grieving over a shattered relationship, immersing myself in the loss of an intimate, important member of my life. A heartbreak will lead to a halt in the progress of all other aspects of life — as I sink in tears, I am unable to attend to my academic activities, originally-planned educational goals, and needless to say, friends and family. As I encounter such a sudden incident, I will be in imperative need of a robot assistant.

As I endure my first heartbreak, my robot assistant will be in full force to bring my life back to its normal state. First of all, it will be in charge of managing all my appointments, reservations and activities as I grasp enough alone time to grieve and cope. It will decline and cancel any upcoming activities on my calendar <sup>for me</sup>. My assistant must be polite as it engages in communication in order to avoid future quarrels upon my cancellation. Secondly, my assistant will be in charge of my meals and encouragement. The best way to deal with melancholy is to enjoy heavenly cuisine and receive emotional support. My assistant needs to boast extraordinary culinary skills in order to prepare heartwarming meals to tend to my senses. It also possesses humanly socializing skills that may shower me with care and hospitality. With great meals, encouraging words and enough alone time, I am sure to receive utmost comfort and recover from my heartbreak in no time.